Thought for the Sunday after Theophany: we read from St. Matthew's Gospel about how the people "who sat in darkness have seen a great light," specifically those who dwelt in the "land of Zebulon and Naphtali the Galilee of the Gentiles." A more literal interpretation tells us that Jesus brought the Light of Love into the darkest corners of the world, into those places his own people did not believe the Light would shine, that is, to the Gentiles. If Jesus took on human nature itself, then the light shines in every human being and therefore in every land. That is what our theology teaches us. Going a little deeper we know that our responsibility as followers of Christ is to take the light we have "received" into the dark places in our families, communities, and society. The Gospel has social implications we ignore far too often. Jesus says that we will be judged if we do not care for the "least of the brethren" who are listed as the sick, the hungry, the naked, and those in prison. Of course, that list is not exhaustive. And when we do care for them we are caring for Christ Himself who became for us and remains for us, as He says, "the least of the brethren."
